General Fuchsia Information

Fuchsias are outdoor plants and prefer cool moist growing conditions with good air circulation and filtered light. The soil should be loose to allow for good drainage and have some organic material. The soil should be kept slightly damp at all times, but never soggy. In very hot weather misting the leaves will perk them up, but do not expose wet leaves to direct sun.

To make your plant bushy, pinching is required. This should be done after every second set of leaves. Blossoms will appear six to eight weeks after pinching the last time. Always remove dead flowers, seedpods, and weak or diseased branches.

For optimal growth and blooming, begin fertilizing half strength in early spring, full strength in the summer, and half strength again in the fall. Stop feeding and remove seedpods by October to allow the plant to harden off for winter storage.

When late fall arrives, DO NOT throw your fuchsia away. Cut the fuchsia back to a little past the edge of the container (flowers are only produced on new wood). Remove all the leaves and store in a cool dark place, which does not freeze. Be sure to remember they need to be watered enough to just be slightly moist. In the spring bring them out into the sunlight, pick off any white shoots. Water well, and start the new season.

During the summer fuchsias require very little care except water and the removal of dead flowers and seedpods. They will give your garden container, or hanging basket a wide range of colors and shapes, with a minimum of effort.
